What has a private civil defense company have to do with patriotism?

Editor:

I enjoyed Dave Trautman's commentary: "Sovereign Deed vs. patriotism." I have worked with Dave on some of the homes he designed and he is a very good architect, and a good man.

His commentary was a nice history lesson to read. What I cannot fathom is why these people who are against Sovereign Deed are so devout in their angst and anger. And maybe I'm naïve a bit but what has a private civil defense company have to do with patriotism? Here is a list of private companies that have something in common with Sovereign Deed. Northern Michigan Regional Hospital is private, Allied EMS Systems is private, ADT Security service, Grams Armed Security service, Grays Patrol Service. All private. And besides FedEx there are other private companies that are on the tarmac at the Pellston Regional Airport. The list goes on and on. Private companies that provide a life saving service that are not run by the government.

And America should be thankful that this is offered because FEMA is one of the most inept programs around, according to a high ranking military personnel who was lateraled over to FEMA, the political hacks that ran everything would not listen to professionals' advice. This was at the time of the California fires.

With the coming in the possible future of the bird flu that even the U of M is preparing for "Influenza and Avian (Bird) Flu Preparedness at the University of Michigan." When the government runs out of vaccine for the little people, (health care and government officials first, children and old people last), one will be glad if Sovereign Deed has some vaccines for sale.
